The value of advice

How having an advisor can bring you closer to reaching your financial goals

Ever notice how many of life's biggest goals have some financial component? Sure, you can master a foreign language or run a marathon without making a significant financial commitment. But try buying a home, starting a family or helping your kids go to university. Same goes for retiring early or leaving a legacy. Without disciplined planning and saving, these goals can just slip away. Like many other Canadians who are juggling a job and a busy family life, you probably don't have time to figure it all out for yourself. Then again, you may feel you don't have the expertise to tackle the complexities of your financial affairs alone.

Not just about retirement

Some Canadians start thinking about talking to an advisor in their 40s or 50s, when retirement first peeks over the horizon. Life-changing events such as buying a house or having a child can also trigger a financial reckoning and the need for advice. But your goals don't have to be that large and you don't have to be wealthy. In fact, 64 per cent of advised households in Canada started working with an advisor when they had less than $50,000 in investable assets. [1]

Working with an expert has plenty of benefits

Turning to a professional for advice offers a huge advantage and can be the decisive factor in helping you meet your goals. Good advice might even help you surpass them. Surprised? According to a recent study, of those surveyed, Canadians with advisors financially outperformed those without. [2]

While different advisors bring different professional and personal skill sets to the table, a solid advisor will do three things:

1. Learn about you. This includes assessing not just your finances, but also your family situation, short- and long-term goals – even your hopes and dreams. Just as important, your advisor will establish your risk profile. Are you the buttoned-down type of investor who avoids risks? Or do you relish the thrill ride of stock markets, with their potential big payoffs? An advisor may also be able to provide access to a network of professional resources such as accounting and legal services.

2. Build your plan. This is the all-important "advice" part. Your advisor will work with you to create a comprehensive plan that balances today's needs with your goals for the future, easily adaptable to changes in circumstance. It should also have milestones along the way, so you can gauge your progress. A complete plan will most likely include:

- Disciplined savings: amounts to put aside on a regular basis
- A customized investment strategy: based on your risk profile and time horizon
- Debt management and cash flow planning: this should be part of every financial plan
- Tax strategy: to help minimize taxes, of course
- Risk management: life, disability and critical illness insurance, to help protect your family
- Retirement plan: depending on your age and goals, the plan may include projections of when you can expect to retire, and with how much money

- Will and estate plan: to protect your legacy

3. Adjust your plan. Life is all about change – often unexpected change. This means your plan should be flexible and subject to a regular review, generally once a year. That's when you'll sit down with your advisor to check your progress, revisit your goals and, if necessary, reset your course.

A prescription for long-term success

As you develop your plan, it's important to be realistic about your expectations. An advisor won't magically make your debt disappear or guarantee double-digit returns on your investments. He or she will, however, provide ongoing support and guidance so you can remain focused on your goals through the ups and downs life throws your way.

Regular checkups: your financial well-being depends on them

Getting started early on with an advisor and scheduling routine reviews can provide a considerable financial advantage in the long run. Be sure to ask questions and get the information you need to feel a high level of trust and comfort. After all, the healthiest and most rewarding relationship is one that will benefit you not just today, but well into your future.

211 Saskatchewan is a FREE, confidential, 24/7 service that can connect newcomers to resources and services in the province by telephone, text, or web chat, plus a searchable website.

- All Saskatchewan residents now have the ability to search independently on the website, or they can receive assistance with their service search from an Information and Referral Specialist (aka community navigator). Services information include: mental health, senior services, basic needs, healthcare, and much more!
- Services over the phone are available in over 175 languages, including 17 Indigenous languages.
- When accessing the phone, text, e-mail or web chat options, the community navigator helps people get to the root of their issues, search the database for the best service for them, and make the connection.

United Way Regina and United Way Saskatoon & Area have made investing in 211 Saskatchewan a top priority under the focus of building strong communities and connecting people to supports.

I'm seeking connect with Town of Rocanville to help residents learn about the 211 SK service. We would be happy to provide free 211 SK pamphlets, posters, and business cards to distribute to people and can provide custom presentations to your staff and residents upon request. If there is a chance, we would appreciate if 211 SK information could be added to your town's website, newsletter or other publications.

We appreciate the continued support from the Community of Rocanville.

We are so very grateful for our community and our local business Rocanville Conexus has donated $5000 to the Pool. These funds will be used to fix and update the upstairs at the Pool so we will be able to use this part of our facility again. Without Community the Pool would never have come as far as it has. Thank you so very much Conexus for again going above and beyond for your local facilities. Pictured - Branch Manager Brandon Carter presenting $5000 donation to Pool Board President Ilene Anderson.
