Who will speak for you?

With a power of attorney for property, you authorize someone else to make decisions about your finances.

Just like a will, a power of attorney allows someone else to carry out your wishes when you're unable to do so. And, just like a will, it's an important part of a comprehensive financial and estate plan. Yet powers of attorney are often less well understood than wills, so it's worth looking more closely at how they work.

What is a power of attorney? A power of attorney authorizes one or more people to manage your money and property for you. The person you appoint does not have to be an actual attorney or lawyer – you can choose a family member, friend or professional. While each province and territory has different legislation governing powers of attorney, there are two basic types.

A general power of attorney takes effect only while you are mentally capable of managing your own affairs. It ends if you become mentally incapable. In addition, it can be "specific" or "limited," applying only to a defined task, such as selling a house, or to a defined time period, such as the dates you plan to be out of the country. It starts either as soon as you sign it or on a date you choose.

An enduring/durable or continuing power of attorney allows your attorney to continue acting for you if you become mentally incapable. It starts either as soon as you sign it or only when you become mentally incapable (such as a springing power of attorney). The standard for incapacity should be specified for a springing power of attorney.

What can your attorney do? You can authorize your attorney to take care of a range of tasks on your behalf, such as managing day-to-day banking, signing cheques, buying or selling real estate, and borrowing money. Your money and property continue to belong to you – you're just delegating authority to manage it. It's important to note that your attorney cannot change your will, change a beneficiary you've named on a life insurance plan or give a new power of attorney to anyone else to act for you.

That said, because your attorney has such important responsibilities, it's a good idea to ask a lawyer who is familiar with your province's or territory's power of attorney legislation to draft your document. A lawyer can ensure that your power of attorney is valid, explain how to monitor your attorney's actions, and tell you how to revoke or change your power of attorney. A lawyer can also incorporate restrictions that limit what your attorney can do.

Who is the right person for the job?

A power of attorney grants considerable authority.

- Questions to consider before selecting an attorney include:
- Is he or she willing to be your attorney?
- Can you trust this person with your finances?
- Is he or she reliable, living nearby, easy to contact and readily available?
- Does he or she have a good understanding of financial matters?
- Are there financial, health or family challenges that may interfere with his or her duties?
- Does he or she have time to dedicate to being your attorney?

Once you've chosen someone, have a candid conversation about why you'd like them to take on this role and what their responsibilities will be. Emphasize that an attorney is legally obligated to act in your best interests at all times and can be liable for a breach of their duties. And talk to your prospective attorney about your financial preferences and wishes. The better your attorney understands how you currently manage your money and property, the better he or she will be able to complement your approach. Furthermore, some provinces require the appointed attorney's signature confirming their acceptance of the role.

Keep in mind that appointing more than one person as your attorney can work well, but it can also lead to disputes that affect the smooth management of your finances. However, having two or more attorneys acting jointly could reduce the risk of fraudulent activities. It is prudent to appoint a successor or alternate attorney who can step in if your first attorney(s) no longer can or no longer wishes to fulfill his or her duties.

If there isn't anyone you feel can adequately perform the responsibilities of an attorney, or if your financial situation is complicated, you have the option of appointing a financial or legal professional, though you will likely have to pay for the professional's services. As well, a family member or friend acting as attorney could also be paid or be eligible for compensation for this role.

Speak with your advisor

Your advisor can provide more information about powers of attorney and refer you to a lawyer who can help you understand the benefits and risks. If you decide to appoint a power of attorney, ask your financial institutions about their rules for working with attorneys and monitoring accounts. In addition, continue to review your own financial records on a regular basis for as long as you are able.

A power of attorney for property covers only your finances and property. A power of attorney for personal care, a personal care directive or an advanced health care directive governs decisions about personal health care.

LIFT STATION

The Town has recently completed some major upgrades to the Main Lift Station to increase pumping capacity and use the latest technology and reduce power costs.

Although an unpleasant conversation we would like to remind everyone that only human waste and the approved toilet tissue should be flushed down your toilet, no wipes, napkins, sanitary towels or diapers. The new floats are already proving what Public Works has for a long time stated, that "KITCHEN GREASE" will stop them working effectively.

The City of North Battleford won an award at the SUMA Convention in February for this project to reduce the disposal of kitchen grease being poured into the drainage system.

Please check out their website by entering "Beware the Grease Beast" and see what your kitchen grease does to our lift station pumps!! SAVE IT! Make a grease ball for the birds and hang in your garden.

Archeological site near Rocanville offers exciting glimpse into life of early people in Sask

BY KARA KINNA

An archeological site in the Qu'Appelle Valley near Rocanville has yielded some important finds that date back to the end of the last ice age, and the discovery of the site and the meticulous recording of the artifacts there is all thanks to the work of some local collectors.

The site was discovered by Jake and Brenda Sarazin and their son James of Rocanville in 2000. Upon discovery, Jake and Brenda began collecting the artifacts found there and contacted the Saskatchewan Heritage Conservation Branch about their finds.

Their collection of artifacts became known as the Sarazin Collection. The collection was donated to the Rocanville Museum who in turned have loaned it to the Royal Saskatchewan Museum for study.

Phillippa and Tom Richards are two of the archeologists who have been studying the collection, and they are excited about some of the artifacts that have been found in the collection.

How it was found

"Jake and Brenda Sarazin were both long-time residents of Rocanville, and in 2000 Jake and his son were out looking for some sand for a pen for their turkey chicks. And they went onto this property and when they were looking at the ground they saw artifacts on the ground, and there were quite a few—arrowheads and spearheads and other stone artifacts," says Tom Richards, Senior Archaeologist with the Heritage Conservation Branch.

"They got their sand and went back home and talked to Brenda about it and Brenda was very excited, and Brenda and Jake went out there and started collecting.

"They put in for a permit from the Heritage Branch—they did the right thing—and so we brought the records of the permits that Brenda and Jake took out in 2000, 2001, 2002, up to about 2005. They went there once or twice a year after it had been cultivated or after there was a rainstorm or a very windy day that might have exposed more artifacts, and they would go back to the location and collect them."

What became apparent after some analysis of the site was that some of the artifacts dated to the Folsom period, a time around 11,000 years ago marked by the retreat of the glaciers on the prairies and by the Folsom people who hunted the Bison antiquus, an extinct species of bison that is larger than today's bison.

"But it wasn't immediately that they found the Folsom material," says Richards. "As we've analyzed the collection, we can see that there are spearheads and arrowheads from lots of periods, not just the really early materials.

"And once they did start to recognize that they found that particular Folsom point (a type of spearhead from the Folsom period), then they were very excited that they had some very early material."

The Folsom complex

"It's an archeological complex that dates between about 11,500 and 12,750 years ago," says Richards. "So around 10,000 BC. These were not the earliest First Nations people in North America. But they were an early group. They were big game hunters and they hunted the extinct bison Bison antiquus, which was 25 to 30 per cent larger than the modern day bison.

"And they made these very distinctive spearheads, very well made, and they were very thin and they had this big flake taken off each side from the base to thin them. That's called a fluting flake, so they are called fluted points, and they have a very distinct form, and you can recognize them right away.

"In the 1920s, the Folsom complex was named after the original find site, which was in Folsom New Mexico, and it was the first time that human artifacts were found in association with extinct animals in North America. So they found those bison bones together with the Folsom points, and that proves that First Nations people were here way back, at least at the end of the last ice age. Prior to that, there was a lot of argument that First Nations people had only been in North America for a few thousand years. This really knocked it back to about 10,000 or 12,000 years right away.

"People could have been living here 14,000 or 15,000 years ago in the southern part of Saskatchewan. The ice had melted and vegetation was growing again. Animals were moving into the area. There were people living south of the ice so they could have easily moved up."

About the artifacts

Richards says the artifacts found at the site span a few different periods and are consistent with tool making and camping at that location.

"There were quite a few different periods. There are other periods that follow Folsom. They would have different spearheads and also you get the introduction of pottery much later on, and then arrowheads, not just spearheads, and they are quite different forms and they are made differently, of different raw materials, different flaking, different sizes. And there are a lot of flakes, chipping debris from when you are making artifacts, and other scrapers and things that are not easily identifiable as belonging to one particular period.

"There were stone scrapers—which are mostly used for scraping hides—cutting tools, little drills. There was also some animal bone, a few bits and fragments of animal teeth as well.

"We went through all the material that Brenda and Jake had collected. Brenda unfortunately passed away a few years ago, and then Jake donated the collection to the Rocanville museum.

An exciting find

One of the most exciting discoveries at the site was something called a Folsom Ultrathin Biface, a type of knife made of heat treated material that was very thin and took a lot of skill to create.

"It's a very rare type or artifact," says Richards. "I had hardly heard of them before we found this one in the collection and identified it for what it was. "It's 13.5 centimeters long, but it's between 4-6 centimeters thick. It's very thin and very well flaked. And those only occur in the Folsom period as well.

"That was a really major find by Jake and Brenda. They found it in three pieces on three separate times that they went out to the site collecting. It was exposed and then they went out another time and another part was exposed, and then they glued it together.

"That's a major find. There are not that many of them known, period. They are found at some Folsom sites. They are extremely well made, they are very thin and they hadn't really even been recognized until about 20 years ago as a distinct artifact. As far as I know this is the first one that has been documented in Saskatchewan. There are probably other ones out there in collections and small museums, I just haven't seen anything written up about them and I haven't seen any in museums."

Richards says many of the artifacts found at the site near Rocanville are made of a material found in North Dakota, but the Folsom Ultra Thin Biface was made of a local material.

"They use a lot of Knife River flint. The Knife River flint quarry is in North Dakota about 340 km in a straight line," says Richards. "There are several ultra thin bifaces made out of knife river flint that have been found in the U.S. That material was widely used in the folsom period. At that time people tended to focus on one or two high quality raw materials even if they had to go a great distance to get them.

"They would hit that location once or twice a year and would have this material with them before they camped in the

"We are looking at this like it's an archeological site, we're looking at the whole assemblage, particularly the items that can be assigned to the Folsom period and then we will talk about what we think people were doing on the site on that basis. The reason we can do that is because Brenda and Jake maintained very good records and they kept all the material from this site separate from the one or two other sites that they looked at. A lot of collectors would have just picked up a whole bunch of arrowheads and spearheads and they mount them in frames and put them up on the wall and they aren't sure where they come from and you lose the context, and the rest of the material that was with them might be in another box. Here you have a whole collection that was kept together and curated very well.

"So that makes it very important. And if we can find some intact deposits it will be extremely important."

The collection is on loan to the Royal Saskatchewan Museum and Richards and his wife Phillippa have been studying it and have written an article in Saskatchewan Archaeology Quarterly about the site.

"Phillippa Richards, my wife, who co-wrote that article, and I have been studying the material at the museum since we've had it on loan for about a year. And in a few month's time we will be finished and will take them back to Rocanville and do a talk at the museum there about our findings," says Richards.

"That's significant because we have no excavated Folsom sites in Saskatchewan. They are all like this, surface finds where you find Folsom projectile points on the ground in a blown out area usually.

"That can tell you something. It tells you that those people were there and you know from the style of the spearhead that it was around 12,000 years ago, plus or minus 500 years, but it doesn't tell you much more than that. What you really want is to be able to find an intact deposit where you will have the stone artifacts and maybe fireplaces, animal bones, or perhaps the remains of structures that will really let you delve into the details of what people were doing at that time."

There are only around 40 documented Folsom find points around Saskatchewan," says Richards.

"They are very rare and nobody has found an intact deposit yet of this age," he says. "This folsom material is least 1,000 years if not 1,500 years older than the next oldest site that has been excavated.

"There are some sites that date to 10,600 but nothing earlier than that that we know that belongs to any particular complex.

"They are very hard to find. There are not a lot of them. The human population would have been relatively low compared to later period, so you have that combination of the sites being there for a long time, so they could have been eroded away or deeply buried, and not that many of them to begin with."

Site was a camping area

So what were people doing on this site around 11,000 years ago, and over the years following?

"I think it was a major camping area that people were at for quite a while, and then they would be retooling," says Richards. "You would have broken damaged spearheads, so you would be taking those out of the hafts and be making new ones and retooling, doing a lot of camping activities. There are quite a lot of scrapers there.

"There are spurred end scrapers. They have a little spur on the corner. That is typical of this really early period. It's not conclusive that it's that early, but many of the scrapers from the early period are like that. They have that form to them, and so there was a lot of hide scraping going on as well at that site."

Site and artifacts were treated with care

Richards says one of the best things about the site near Rocanville is how Brenda and Jake treated it with so much care as they collected the artifacts.

"To further this research we think this sort of information should get out. We are just trying to find that intact Folsom or Clovis site so we can extend our knowledge of the pre-history of Saskatchewan a few thousand more years."

A heartfelt...THANK YOU!

Trent and I would like to send a

Thank You to our amazing community and surrounding communities for all of the benefit donations,

as well as your time, thoughts and prayers that we have received throughout our journey with Will.

It is an amazing feeling to have that kind of support from your "village".

We have many unknowns with Will – we don't know how his vision will turn out, we don't know if there will be further delays –

but one thing that we know for absolute certain is how lucky he is to get to grow up in a community that supports him and cheers him on.

So again, thank you to everyone!

211 Saskatchewan is a FREE, confidential, 24/7 service that can connect newcomers to resources and services in the province by telephone, text, or web chat, plus a searchable website.

- All Saskatchewan residents now have the ability to search independently on the website, or they can receive assistance with their service search from an Information and Referral Specialist (aka community navigator). Services information include: mental health, senior services, basic needs, healthcare, and much more!

- Services over the phone are available in over 175 languages, including 17 Indigenous languages.

- When accessing the phone, text, e-mail or web chat options, the community navigator helps people get to the root of their issues, search the database for the best service for them, and make the connection.

United Way Regina and United Way Saskatoon & Area have made investing in 211 Saskatchewan a top priority under the focus of building strong communities and connecting people to supports.

I'm seeking connect with Town of Rocanville to help residents learn about the 211 SK service. We would be happy to provide free 211 SK pamphlets, posters, and business cards to distribute to people and can provide custom presentations to your staff and residents upon request. If there is a chance, we would appreciate if 211 SK information could be added to your town's website, newsletter or other publications.

Thanks in advance,

Moosomin & District Arts Council

Presents:

The Johnny McCuaig Band

The Johnny McCuaig Band mixes traditional Canadian east coast jigs with the modern power of radio rock music. You'll jump out of your seat to clap and dance along to the band as they rip through rocked up versions of old standards like Ten Penny Bit and Patty's Leather Breeches along with some new modern rock anthems like Here We Go currently used by the Saskatchewan Roughriders as their take the field fight song. Between songs the band reaches out and connects with the audience in their casual fun way that shows that they not only take their rock music seriously, but have a great sense of humour too and know how to laugh and engage with the crowd. Let the party begin! Join the McCuaig Brigade!

CONTAMINATION ALERT

February 2020

Dear Resident,

Crisis is perhaps too strong a word, but contamination of recycle material is, in general, a growing problem in North America. In 2018 China stopped accepting recycle materials from around the globe. The result is an oversupply of recyclables, driving values down and processing costs up. The need for maintaining and improving the quality of what is collected is greater than ever.

As you know, recycling processing relies, in part, on separating acceptable materials from garbage. Material Recovery Facilities (MRFs) are being vigilant in reducing the contamination levels in the materials they are marketing; however, this takes more time and expense.

In order to maintain a strong and effective recycling program, we need your cooperation. Any items listed as acceptable can go in the 'BLUE' recycle cart and any remaining items go in the garbage or an alternative recycling facility, e.g. light bulbs and metal parts. Contaminated recycle loads may result in additional fees being charged back to the municipalities.

If you have any doubt whether or not an item can be recycled, please contact Loraas or at a minimum, when in doubt put it in the garbage.

Attached is a helpful poster which outlines our recycling program. This poster details what can and cannot be put in the blue cart or bin.

Thank You, we appreciate your cooperation as we attempt to keep recycle material clean and costs to the municipalities low.
