Make no mistake, the stock market isn't the economy

The two financial terms we hear about the most shouldn't be confused.

In the world of financial news, headlines can be confusing. Just when one proclaims that stock markets are hitting record highs, another may just as easily say the economy is in deep trouble. But how can this be? How can stock market numbers look so rosy next to a gloomy outlook for the economy?

The simple explanation is that the two are very different. Yet they each affect one another to such a significant degree that the relationship between them remains critical to our financial system – even when they move in different directions.

Major differences

Stock markets, such as the Dow Jones Industrial Average, the Standard & Poor's (S&P) 500 Index and the S&P/TSX Composite Index (Toronto Stock Exchange) understandably get a lot of attention. After all, stock markets are where the action is. Massive amounts of money are traded each day, while numbers bounce between highs and lows in reaction to the latest economic news and activity. Meanwhile, speculation about what will pay off and what won't continuously drives the markets forward.

At their core, stock markets showcase the financial strength of publicly listed companies from various sectors of the economy, such as energy, natural resources, finance and technology. They thrive on a combination of speculation, factual financial information and risk tolerance, which investors measure to project a company's potential for future profit and growth. The economy, in contrast, is considerably larger and more complex and affects people's lives more directly than the markets.

Booms and busts

When the COVID-19 pandemic spread around the world in early 2020, global stock markets went into a tailspin. Many businesses were closing, most air travel was grounded indefinitely, and unemployment numbers were rising fast. As a result, the Canadian economy suffered its worst quarter ever, contracting 38.7 per cent on an annualized basis in the second quarter of the year.^[1] But even as the disease raged on, markets began to recover their losses through the second quarter despite the economic impacts of the widespread effort to contain the virus. The market momentum continued in defiance of the dire economic outlook.

"The stock market is meant to be forward-looking. In general, what you see right now in the economy is what's going on right now, such as production, employment and so forth. Even in normal times, stock prices and economic output would not move in tandem."

- Itay Goldstein, Professor of Finance, Wharton School of Business at the University of Pennsylvania

To use a vivid example, the five companies with the largest market capitalization on the S&P 500 Index (at December 2020) are the technology giants Apple, Microsoft, Facebook, Amazon and Alphabet (Google), which together account for about one-fifth of the index's market value.^[2] This concentration means that the overall index does not paint a very broad picture of how the economy is performing overall. Consider that Apple's share value alone exceeded US$2 trillion in August 2020.^[3] In other words, it demonstrates that a single company can hold more stock value than all the other companies listed on a single stock exchange combined. This reflects the great confidence investors have in the current and future state of the company. In contrast, retail operations and energy companies had a tougher time keeping their stock values trending upward in 2020.

S&P/TSX Composite Index performance vs. unemployment in Canada in 2020

The S&P/TSX Composite Index has almost fully recovered from the dramatic market slide that occurred in March 2020. Meanwhile, the unemployment rate remains above levels seen at the beginning of the year. This illustrates that even though the current state of the economy is far from perfect, stock markets can climb higher on future expectations.

S&P 500 Index performance vs. unemployment in the United States in 2020

S&P 500 Index has more than recovered from the declines in March. Though the U.S. unemployment numbers have improved, they have not returned to pre-pandemic levels. Historically, a booming economy has been one of the key drivers of market optimism. Yet, the U.S. and Canadian markets continue to climb based on the expectation of better economic conditions in 2021 and beyond.

Throwing money at a sinking ship

When the economy shows signs of severe weakness or is wounded by a crisis, as it was in 2020, spending money can be an effective solution. It may seem counterintuitive, but governments of prosperous countries can turn to quantitative easing (QE) to provide some relief. QE is a monetary policy by which central banks, such as the U.S. Federal Reserve (the Fed) and the Bank of Canada, increase the domestic money supply with the aim of generating more economic activity through loans, spending and investing. The central banks fund the money-making by buying long-term government bonds and other securities. Placing more money into circulation also helps keep interest rates low, which can encourage more borrowing and spending to keep the economy afloat

Good news is good for business

As the costly fight against COVID-19 begins to show signs of progress with the discovery and distribution of promising vaccines, stock markets are reacting to a renewed sense of optimism about the global economy. However, it's important to remember that widespread prosperity, rising employment and increasing trade and investment are the goals that countries will continue to strive towards before any realistic claims of victory over the pandemic can be made.

Overall, the future is starting to look brighter.

Good News for the Pool

Article taken from the May 25th Issue of the World Spectator

After decades of struggling with expenses and how best to tackle major repairs that are needed at Rocanville's indoor pool in order to keep it operational, the town received some welcome news on Wednesday that it will receive a $1.27 million grant for the pool through the federal-provincial Investing in Canada Infrastructure Program (ICIP).

The money is a major shot in the arm for a facility that had the town council and rec department discussing regularly how best to deal with major infrastructure improvements that are needed at the aging facility.

The town will be receiving $1,269,782 through ICIP and will be contributing $461,818 as the town's portion, bringing the total investment in the pool to $1,731,600. Of the town's $461,818 portion of the funding, the town and rec department are hoping to be able to raise at least $250,000 in donations.

Work on the facility must be completed by December 2022, meaning the town must move quickly to get work started this winter, so the pool can be operational for the spring 2022 season.

Rocanville Mayor Ron Reed says the town will be meeting with engineers to assess everything that needs to be done at the pool so they can come up with a plan of action for starting on the project and bringing in donations.

"We do have a lot of work to do there. It's just going to be a matter of meeting up with the engineers and figuring out the best path for the money," says Reed. "Whether it is repairing the pool tank and the deck and piping, or the building, we need to get a cost benefit analysis done on all those types of jobs, an approximate cost, and then make a decision on what we want to do. We'll work closely with (Rec Director) Andrea (Logan), because she is so invested in the pool, to come up with the best game plan."

Reed says the grant is a welcome relief.

"We've been scraping by and making do with the state that the pool is in now, and just trying to keep it open," he says. "It is a draw to the community. There aren't many indoor pools in the area that have the benefit of opening early in the season and staying open late (like we do). We've got to get it to that point where it's almost a four-season facility."

Reed says council and the rec director have talked about the possibility of starting from scratch with a new pool, but he says the cost of a new pool would be closer to $2.5 million.

He says the $250,000 fundraising target is a big goal for a small town, but with $1.27 million on offer from the government, he hopes the community steps up and starts fundraising to make it happen.

"We're hoping the community and surrounding area does step up. There are pools in the surrounding area that are struggling to find certified staff for when they're open. So we're hoping as an indoor facility we're able to be opened up earlier and we can draw in some of that crowd as well and have other communities in the area get their certifications done through the Rocanville facility and really help the whole region overall, as far as the pool staff and certifications go."

Reed says the pool plays a big role in the community and surrounding area.

"It's defiantly huge," he says. "It's one of the things that a lot of the students in the schools are interested in as far as summer work. Because it's an indoor facility, it kind of serves that in-between time between when people are wanting to get out to the lake versus when hockey season is done. It works as an outing for the entire community, it's somewhere to go and still be active."
